The task was to plan a surface that would hold the long narrow curved space together.

The pavement follows the curve of the medieval city layout and gently lays into the curve, consisting of wide longitudinal and narrow transverse bands of slabs. This alternating basic form radially follows the curve of the Angers.

As-less-as-possible - the Anger fills itself.
The planning task was to free up the space, while making it highly attractive in both form and use.

The first construction phase was completed in October 2002 after two years of construction. The second construction phase has been under construction since May 2011.

The design approach was to bring the urban space with its historic facades to bear and at the same time to meet the modern demands placed on it. The 30,000 square meter pedestrian zone was modernized with a light granite surface, new street furniture, fresh plants and a differentiated lighting concept.

Spatial and lighting design link the heterogeneous peripheral buildings consisting of medieval town houses, church buildings, turn-of-the-century commercial buildings and new department stores.
